Transformations
for Clara Schepers

Grandma, the day you died, late in December, I crossed from Kentucky to Ohio.
Parallel strings of light I drove between transposed

to strands of DNA, pulsing.
Streetlamps flared,
floated from their posts, drew together like magnets.

When the current entered,
I no longer heard
tires hum the bridge,
felt the wheel vibrate, smelled winter or river.

The moment peeled forward, into place,
and lamps returned to their posts and subdued states.

I don't remember driving the leftover blocks, but I never forgot how the light bodies clustered as you birthed your way back.
